Assisted Living is housing designed to assist adults with bathing, dressing, grooming, medications and meal preparation. The care is less intensive than nursing home care. This support is provided in a setting this is, by design, residential in nature and is intended not to be temporary. Residents often live in their own room or apartment within a building or group of buildings. They also often have some or all of their meals together. Social and recreational activities are usually provided. Some of these facilities have health services on site. Not all assisted living facilities provide the same services. In most cases, assisted living residents pay a regular monthly rent, and then pay additional fees for the services they get.¹
